I was wrapped in Vedic song, and yet I made an unconscious halt, gazing intently upon the slab which the ebbing and flowing waves for centuries had evidently at last succeeded in dashing upon a peaceful shore. Slowly I awoke from my Vedic dream; warily, as if the fragment had been cast upon consecrated ground, I raised and examined the stone, and saw that the deeply-indented characters, as well as the smooth surface upon which they had been chiselled, must have been the work of human hands. Presently I thought that the letters and words were Sanskritic, but the effacing work of ages and...
