Excerpt: . . . they were soon seated, and plunged in conversation, though he left the door a little ajar, that he might catch the slightest sound in the sick chamber above. I have, on this occasion, made a bed-room of my study, said he; because, from having constantly a fire in it, the temperature is there more equable than in any other room in the house. Besides, it is much larger than our bed-room, and altogether more cheerful. The two friends then entered into an explanation. Upon learning how long Denzil had been in town, You would naturally suppose, observed Alexis, that we were still at Southampton, as you could not have received the letter which I wrote to you, on our removal hither. I almost fancy that the same idea still possesses my own family also, since it is now some months since I have heard from Abertaf. Alexis then related that his literary speculations had been fortunate, and that he did not doubt being able to command such a measure of success, as to a man of his moderate desires, would be amply sufficient. I should, in fact, said he, be perfectly happy, were it not for the dangerous state in which my poor boy now is. His mother, as you perceive, is nearly worn out with fatigue. She has sat up with him, night after night, denying herself sleep, until nature could hold out no longer. She is now, therefore, at length overcome by...
